STORM AND STRESS

By MRS. M. L. RAYNE.

A steamer crossing one of the great lakes in a night of sudden tempest was thrown helpless and at the mercy of wind and wave into the trough of the sea by the breaking of a part of the machinery. The panic-stricken passengers crowded the deck and impeded the action of the crew. They screamed and sobbed and prayed. One man who stood apart from the others prayed silently with a hopeless agony in his face. A friend with him touched him on the shoulder.

"Cheer up, Edgar, we are not lost yet" (he had a sudden contempt for the cowardice of the occasion) "at least let us die—if die we must—like men."

"It is not for myself I fear, Walter, but for Miriam; she is so sensitive, so loyal to those she loves; it would break her heart to have her lover drowned like this on the eve of her wedding. She could never outlive such a tragedy."

"She would not be the only one left to suffer. If we go down all these others perish with us. Think you, they will leave none to mourn their loss?" his friend, Walter Dickson, responded.

"There are not parallel cases. Miriam will be a widow, yet no wife. It will be a cruel disappointment of her plans for our happy lives. Walter, if you alone are saved tell her that she must learn to forget me. Her sweet young life must not be darkened by unhappy memories. Promise me."

Something like a snarl distorted Walter Dickson's face; he said with bitter emphasis:

"You have been blind, Edgar, blind as a mole. With eternity in view I must tell you the truth. Come below with me. If we are to die in this storm I shall ease your soul of its last fear. If we live you can prove the truth of my words."

On the same night on which the steamer with her precious human freight, was tempest-tossed in the midnight blackness of the tempestuous lake, a young woman was walking the floor of her room, wringing her hands in impotent anguish as she listened to the storm without. At last the strain became unbearable, and she rushed from her own room and sought that of an older sister.

The older sister sat up and scanned the white face bending above her.

"You have not slept, and tomorrow is your wedding day! Miriam, you will look like a ghost."

"Do you hear the storm?" cried Miriam wildly. "If it rages so on land, how much worse it must be on the water, and Edgar is crossing tonight in the face of this storm."

"Miriam," said Margaret, gently, "kneel here and let us say a prayer."

"I have been praying—prayed every minute this night. I hope God will hear me and send the boat on which Edgar is coming to the bottom of the lake!"

"Then it is true—I did not, would not believe it! You did not love Edgar Ryerson and you do love his friend, Walter Dickson?"

But Miriam turned away. "Sleep again, sister, I am sorry I disturbed you. My wedding day is dawning and we shall soon know whether God has answered my prayer."

A brief line in the morning paper told the story. The boat had gone down in midlake with all on board. Years had passed. Margaret had married a wealthy suitor, and Miriam spent part of her time with her, a pale, silent girl, absolutely devoid of interest in life. For whom was she mourning? She declared that it was not for Walter Dickson, that it was all a mistake that she had cared for him, save as a friend. Margaret never noticed the words of the little song so often on Miriam's lips:

"How could I know I would love thee afar
When I loved thee not afar?"

They voiced the cry of Miriam's soul. She loved Edgar afar.

The family—including Miriam—was giving a house party before closing their summer home on the banks of the lake. As a closing entertainment someone suggested a masquerade and a fire of driftwood, as the evenings were cool. Miriam wore a mask and domino. On account of the temperature the driftwood fire was the first attraction. A Hindu uttered the prophecies, while others fed the flame.

"I see," he said, oracularly, "a sinking steamer. The men—comrades—are with others upon its deck."

"Oh, this is shameful—stop him," cried Margaret, but her husband whispered something, and she waited, edging near Miriam, who in her attitude might have been a statue.

"The friend is telling him a lie, but he believes it, and when they two are saved by a miracle of the waters he goes with him and makes no sign. He believes that his love is faithless."

The flames shot up blue and green, and the Hindu looked about as if seeking inspiration.

"The false friend has just died. He told the truth at the last. But he was not altogether wrong. The woman they both had loved had not returned the love of either. I can read no further." The pretended Hindu turned away as a domino touched his arm.

"Edgar!"

"Miriam."

Joy never kills. The recuperative power it brings with it is phenomenal. —Chicago Record-Herald.
